Dear Mr. Pritchard,

Despite years of discussion, literature back to the turn of the century, thousands of people already diagnosed, and inquires from various parties, the Mental Health Facilities Branch has not yet acted to rescue those persons whose psychiatric problems are caused or significantly exacerbated by environmental sensitivities.

They seem determined to keep persons with this hidden disability invisible! Perhaps it's because an acknowledgment of the long-standing legitimacy of the complaints of persons with sensitivities involves the admission that treatment of members of this disabled group by the Ministry of Health has been unethical, unprofessional, irresponsible, and abusive, resulting in millions of dollars damages, increased disability, and several deaths.

I hope you can encourage the Branch to:

- 1) rescue those patients whose central nervous system dysfunction is caused or significantly exacerbated by sensitivities,
- 2) adopt the practice of referring patients for an assessment for sensitivities before embarking on potentially detrimental forms of psychiatric intervention, including drugs.

Innocents wait to be rescued while emperors model their clothes.

Sincerely

DUPLICATE
